AMS celebrates two years of building the case for conservative, pro-growth solutions to climate change

Washington, D.C. – The Alliance for Market Solutions (AMS) is celebrating its two-year anniversary. Founded by conservative leaders, the organization is addressing two of America’s most pressing challenges: the need to reduce airborne carbon pollution and grow the economy.

AMS supports a pro-growth policy that would eliminate harmful regulations and replace them with a revenue-neutral carbon tax that enables markets, instead of government, to allocate resources, stimulate innovation and capital investment, support clean energy, and effectively reduce carbon pollution.

“Given the latest science, addressing climate change is imperative,” said AMS Chairman Jeffrey Williams. “A durable, market-based solution is necessary, not only to reduce airborne carbon pollution but to ensure the United States’ economy is vibrant and strong to promote growth and opportunity for every American.”

Since its inception, AMS has engaged directly with Republican policymakers and influential conservatives to cultivate support for pro-growth policies to address climate change. The organization also built a robust library of resources—including research papers/reports commissioned by prominent economists and academic institutions and its first publication, Carbon Tax Policy: A Conservative Dialogue on Pro-Growth Opportunities—that demonstrate the efficiency of a carbon tax.

“When we started, almost no Republicans acknowledged climate change, and none were discussing a carbon tax,” explained Alex Flint, the executive director of AMS. “Today, a large part of the Republican caucus has acknowledged climate change, and a carbon tax is part of the debate on how to address it. We have a long way to go but have come a long way in 24 months.”

Alliance for Market Solutions (AMS) is an organization of conservative leaders with experience in business, government, and the intellectual community who know that markets and economic incentives are the most powerful drivers of change and are more efficient and effective than top-down regulation. We aim to educate conservative policymakers on the benefits of market-oriented solutions to one of America's most pressing economic challenges: advancing clean energy and reducing carbon pollution.

The carbon tax policy we support is consistent with a pro-growth conservative agenda. It would replace costly regulations and prevent new regulations from burdening families and job creators. And it would eliminate economically harmful taxes on investment and family incomes.

AMS is a 501(c)(3) non-profit educational organization. We don't engage in electoral politics on behalf of any candidate, campaign or party. We are recruiting allies and developing policy analyses to help conservative policymakers consider a pro-growth, conservative carbon tax policy.
